Strength of personal and environmental influences on children's physical activity; the early environment and later influences. The purpose of this study was to examine the strength of associations between home and school influences and physical activity among children. Elementary school children in Massachusetts (n = 1282) completed a 24-h recall with their parents at the beginning of fourth grade. School time was coded and a maternal questionnaire and child self-report surveys were completed at each time point. Home and school influences on physical activity, including parental support for physical activity, family rules for physical activity, children's involvement in physical activity, parental expectations about physical activity, and parental monitoring of children's activity, were assessed. Children's physical activity was strongly and positively associated with school involvement and positively but less strongly with home involvement. Positive associations were also noted with parental support for physical activity, family rules for activity, children's involvement in physical activity, and parental expectations. A similar pattern was observed when children were matched to their most physically active child, but the associations were stronger. Positive correlations were also observed between physical activity of the children and themselves. Strong and comparable associations were observed between school and home influences on children's physical activity. These results point to the need to consider personal and environmental influences when attempting to promote physical activity among children. An investigation has been launched after a group of up to 20 Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant (ISIL, also known as ISIS) extremists opened fire on Kurdish Peshmerga forces near the restive crossroads city of Bashiqa, located about 150 km west of Mosul, a security source said. The attack took place as both sides clashed on Monday at the International border gate called Al-Wab, which has been the focal point of clashes between the two sides in Bashiqa city and its surrounding areas.
