HIGH OCTANE IN CAMBRIDGE, England — Cyberdemolition has successfully been awarded the contract to supply the explosive ordinance disposal robots (EODR) used by the Royal Engineers (RE) in the Department for International Development’s (DFID’s) training programs across the world. The machines have already been deployed to Turkey, Kenya and Peru in support of DFID’s Goal Zero Emergency Response program, which aims to ensure remote areas of countries in crisis have access to emergency aid. The machines, with their spinning wheels, are used to remove explosive devices, search buildings and perform first-responder tasks. The Cyberspin family of arms, which include the Cyberdemolition HEDR and Cyberspin EODR, are designed to reduce the risk to the operator and protected personnel by performing remote actions. Supported by a change of government, the RE is re-organizing and has allocated £12 million of government funds toward building a new capability center. The new state-of-the-art EODR capability center will be operational by December 2014. “With the launch of DFID’s new equipment at World Village, we will have a real world EODR training challenge.”

Back in the 1890’s, his store opened at the Chicago World’s Fair, made him a wealthy man, and he retired from the business and the world of business at age 67. Instead of building an elite group of employees, he built a close knit family of working family members who knew, valued and relied upon each other. My mother’s best friend in her childhood was her brother, Burt. It was Burt who was a deacon in the Methodist Church, who protected her from her teen years, who carried her to her first day of school, and who shared the responsibility of teaching her to read.
