Q: Sending HTTP response from PHP script I have a PHP script that I want to use for a small client side application. This PHP script will be called on a button click event on the client, and it will perform some calculation, and then give back some value. I am thinking of using Ajax to do this, and the value I need to send back to the client in the AJAX request, and then echo it to the client in the response. (Or even just send the value directly if this is possible.) I am afraid that PHP script will have to terminate once the AJAX request is received and the response is sent back. If this is the case, I was thinking of using forward-coded scripts, so that the PHP script will terminate right at the spot where the response is to be generated. Can this be done? Or should I use some other technique? A: Your best bet is to use a module that does this for you. I'm a fan of One major advantage to using this is that you get real time data on successful response. Instead of getting an XHR success event AFTER the page has been served up, the JS gives you an XHR error event, which means you get the response as soon as it's received. Another thing to bear in mind is that, although your server will send a response, it may not actually send that information to the client. When you're using proxy servers to send data to the client the connection to the proxy can time out or be terminated, which will mean that the response isn't sent to the client. This can be important when you're using WSAPis like SOAP, because you're not just sending a response, you're actually transferring a message. So it's very important that you make sure that the connection to the proxy server is working. for common inflections. I'm hoping this will encourage other languages to step up and offer such tools. ~~~ steveklabnik There are multiple ways to do this. One way is to have a notion of an abstract alphabet and simply iterate through a set of words from the abstract alphabet, but these are quite hard to get 0cc13bf012
