onÂ .Anyone who's watched golf before has a fairly good
understanding of what goes on behind the scenes. While the excitement of the tournament might be a bit over the top, the result of the tournament is what matters. There are many factors that come into play behind the scenes that most golf
fans don't really pay attention to. The preparation is one of those things most golf fans don't pay attention to. Many golfers out there are known for doing most of their training on the course. In addition to the great deal of concentration and focus that comes with playing a round of golf, there are many other things that the average golfer does on the course that affects his or her swing mechanics. Let's take a look at a few things a golfer can do to improve their swing. 1. Hip Shrug The hip shrug is a movement during which the shoulder blades are pulled back and hinged to the sides of the torso. This is one of the best places to do your pre-swing training, as it improves your hinging of the body. It improves your balance and power transfer. It also affects the position of your shoulders and arms. It can be done in front of a mirror to allow for proper visualization and exercises can be easily incorporated. 2.

Backswing Many golfers commonly make bad backswings. The backswing should be started in the same position as the downswing in that it starts with your back being in line with the direction of your finish.

It is advisable to also “keep your shoulders open,” as this is a huge part of a good backswing. Keeping the hips forward and the elbows being pulled back as opposed to out, this will assist in improving a golfer’s backswings.

3. Grip

Most golfers have their grips between the thumb and forefinger on the left hand and the pointer finger and ring finger on the right.

You should practice using the “one-hand” grip for a few months. It will improve your rotation and deliver the ball further. It’s not a strong grip per se, but it will still be a much more accurate shot than using the two-hand position. If you have not yet decided on what you want to do regarding your grip, practicing with the
