According to a variant, the auxiliary current is constant, whilst the direct current bias is adjusted to a value such that the total power output of the motor vehicle, comprising the sum of the auxiliary current and the motor torque can be minimised, or the motor torque is varied as a function of the direct current bias. The motor torque is used to indicate the loss of traction of the motor vehicle, which may be ascertained by an electronic control unit and a suitable device that is referred to below as a driving wheel slip detection system (DSS). According to one embodiment, the driving wheel slip detection system (DSS) is a velocity sensor, which is conventionally referred to as a wheel velocity sensor. The wheel velocity sensor has a housing to which a measuring element is attached which is at least partially exposed to the pressure of the oncoming tire. This type of wheel velocity sensor is known to the skilled person as a wheel sensor and is described in detail, for example, in DE 199 54 144 C1. Other driving wheel slip detection systems (DSS) are known, for example radar systems, optical systems, and systems which evaluate the wheel speed indirectly. The measuring element has a measuring element casing at which the measuring element is held. The measuring element casing is attached to the housing by means of a 6d1f23a050
