There have been few investigations of fluoride release rates from dental caries prophylactic materials used clinically for long-term treatment. This paper describes the fluoride release from a group of commercially available adhesive and encapsulated fluoride-releasing compomers in a 0.5% NaF solution. A fluoridated control composite, a non-fluoride adhesive compomer and a non-fluoride encapsulated compomer were also tested. After 1 week in water, and for all materials tested, up to 30% fluoride was released. After 14 months in a 0.5% NaF solution, cumulative release of fluoride was the highest (7.9 microg) for a compomer formulated as an encapsulated product. Two compomers (14.6 microg) showed higher fluoride release than the adhesive compomer (10.4 microg) after 14 months of exposure to a 0.5% NaF solution. The fluoride release from the compomers and control composite was probably due to the continuous leaching of a small proportion of fluoride ions from the tooth structure into the solution. Over periods of 2 months to 15 months no marked change in fluoride release was found for any of the compomers. Between 2 and 15 months in a 0.5% NaF solution, two of the compomers released up to 15 microg fluoride in 3 months. All the materials (with the exception of the encapsulated product) showed a distinct rise in fluoride release after 12 months in the 0.5% NaF solution. The advantages and disadvantages of the materials tested are discussed in relation to their potential clinical application.
