The disclosure relates generally to power systems, and more particularly, to systems and methods for operating power system components. At least some known power system components are operated by applying variable voltage or current loads to the power system components. These power system components are often switched in and out of the circuit under the control of a power controller. The power controller may determine a power output for each switching period based on a duty cycle (or on a power output set point for an active period) and one or more power system conditions. At least some known power controller circuitry may be configured to control switching between phases of a power system by varying a duty cycle with respect to a power system voltage. By varying a duty cycle, a voltage level of a power system output may be increased or decreased. However, when the amount of power system output is greater than an allowable maximum power capacity for a circuit that is designed to handle the power system output, power flow to the power system output may be limited to a safe operating level, resulting in a power system overload. Additionally, when power system output is limited to a safety level, the efficiency of the power system is decreased.
